Lucy: The question of whether the state, in this case Washington, can make its regulations applicable to out-of-state manufacturers is a difficult one. As you mentioned, another federal court found that Colorado could not do so to a competitor that refused to comply with its regulations. But this case presents an issue that does not arise in Colorado because Washington State law does not make it a violation of law to sell or otherwise transport foreign puppies out-of-state. Washington does not have any strict interstate commerce regulation (compared to Colorado), so one could argue that when both parties are in Washington State, both are subject to its relevant laws. A key factor in determining if a case presents a question of federal law is whether the case involves a "particularized" set of facts that is unique. In contrast, a case might also
