What's New In?

Dodo and Blackcap Dodo and Blackcap is a painting by the British artist John Everett Millais, completed in 1884. The painting depicts two moorland birds: a doe-eyed wheatear (Oenanthe oenanthe) and a blackcap (Sylvia atricapilla). Background Millais had initially painted other birds from the same pair: a blackcap on Rooks Rock, Cornwall (1883), and a wheatear on Brimpton Hill, Berkshire (1883). In 1884, when he was commissioned to paint the birds for The Garden Birds series, he decided to reverse the order of the two works, and place the blackcap first. It is now in the Henry Tonks Bequest at the Tate Gallery, London. Analysis The work is part of Millais' Garden Birds series, begun in 1884 with his commission to paint two pairs of garden birds. The Garden Birds series was begun by John Ruskin, who also had commissioned Millais to paint The Oven Bird, Kelmscott Manor, (1880). The Garden Birds were to influence Millais' later work, at first in the painting How the Griggers Came by Marriage, at the Royal Academy in 1893, and then in the Columbine series begun in 1893. In the painting, the two birds are balanced by their size and in the colour of their plumage. The doe-eyed wheatear has her head turned towards the viewer, as if to acknowledge and address the man. The blackcap, on the other hand, turns to the right. Both birds appear poised, as if in mid-flight, with the distant horizon a green expanse of moor. The pair of birds appears to be set on a sunny, open moor, perhaps with a reedy stream. The painting itself suggests that, while the pair of birds at the center is set on an open, sunny moor, they are not in flight, but merely posed. Reception Millais was critical of the work, and, in his letter of 6 March 1884 to John Ruskin, he said: At first I did not quite understand the exquisite value of the little picture. Then on approaching the light in the picture more closely, that also seemed rather under what it ought to be. I did not like this at all; but
