Branch retinal vein occlusion (BRVO) is a common retinal vascular disorder that may cause progressive visual loss. However, the exact pathophysiology remains unknown. To investigate the role of interleukin-8/CXCR-1 axis in the pathogenesis of cystoid macular edema in patients with BRVO. Prospective, consecutive, interventional case series. Cystoid macular edema in 16 eyes of 16 patients with BRVO was examined by using spectral domain optical coherence tomography and was correlated with the clinical outcome and the expression of the interleukin-8/CXCR-1 axis. patients underwent a single intravitreal injection of anti-vascular endothelial growth factor on days 1, 7, and 14. The results demonstrated that, in the eyes with cystoid macular edema, interleukin-8 was significantly increased ( $P = 0.001$ ) and the expression of CXCR-1 was significantly decreased ( $P = 0.008$ ) compared with the control eyes. These changes were correlated with the clinical outcome. Intravitreal anti-vascular endothelial growth factor injections led to a significant decrease of interleukin-8 expression ( $P = 0.001$ ) and an increase of CXCR-1 expression ( $P = 0.001$ ). Moreover, correlation analyses revealed that there was no significant correlation between CXCR-1 expression and visual acuity changes induced by anti-vascular endothelial growth factor injection. The findings suggest that the interleukin-8/CXCR-1 axis plays a crucial role in the pathogenesis of cystoid macular edema in patients with BRVO.Q:
