Or would its future be something else? I guess what I'm asking is why is Rails the framework of choice for most web apps? A: Well, that's an interesting question. In the past, I've heard many Rails developers say that they use Rails because it was created by a startup that was acquired by a large company. I think that is a very important fact for the success of Rails. I think the success of Rails is because it really is a very good piece of code and it has a very long list of (I believe) very good contributors that work in Rails. These include David Heinemeier Hansson, the author of the Rails framework, and many others. This list includes very important people like Rails core contributor Aaron Patterson, regular contributors like James Campos, regular contributors like Joe Shields, a product lead from Yahoo for Rails, and many others. These contributors have made Rails a very good piece of code. In addition, you can also read the commit log for Rails to see that there are many contributors. But it's not just these contributors. Rails is very active, with very good support and a vibrant community. That community, I would argue
