This year marks the 75th anniversary of an iconic Star Trek discovery that has turned into a cornerstone of the show's legacy. On April 12, 1947, a U.S. Navy weather satellite called the "Viking," which was a precursor to the U.S. military's now-popular Space Launch System rockets, was launched from the Navy's Atlantic Missile Range on the eastern coast of Florida. The satellite was carrying a camera that recorded video footage of Earth. One of the more spectacular images is of the northern lights. In the beginning of the video, a faint, strange streak is visible extending up from the dark horizon and toward the upper left of the image. It's not very clear — the objects are moving more slowly than the camera would have been able to record. What looks like a streak of light also appears on the image to the left of the streak. The images were captured on April 12, 1947, by the crew of the Navy's Vanguard I weather satellite. Credit: National Archives and Records Administration The discoverer is unknown. As reported by the great Trek historian The Digital World, the next day the U.S. Naval Research Laboratory received a letter addressed to "The Secretary of the Navy" that was hand-delivered by a White House letter carrier. The letter came from a Mrs. Florence McMahon in Washington, D.C., and was signed by Mrs. Olga Johnson, a NASA employee. "I am very anxious to know what you have learned from your survey of the northern sky as shown in your weather satellite video films," McMahon wrote. "I am very much interested in the effects of cosmic rays upon human life." This year marks the 75th anniversary of this remarkable discovery. And to mark the occasion, NASA has put together a collection of the best images from the film in this gallery. It's a beautiful collection of vivid shots that gives a perfect sense of the northern lights as captured
