In case you do not want to buy or do not need a subscription, you can still get Photoshop as a standalone application for a cheap price. When doing some of the bigger Photoshop tasks, the process can become time consuming. I would recommend trying to do them in batches. Filing your work with alpha channels is one way to organize your work. This will ensure that when you zap out a part of your image and then replace it with another, you are only using the alpha channel instead of having to somehow erase parts of it and then line them up. The other way to work in batches is to take a break every so often. This really depends on your body clock. But for me, sometimes I will wake up at 3am and start working and leave it until 4pm. This can be very helpful for those times when you are staring at your screen for ten or twelve hours at a time. When you are finished with your work, do save a backup. Once you are done, it is important to back your work up on a separate drive that is separate from your main computer. This is to ensure that if something goes wrong, you are covered. As stated above, Photoshop's biggest strengths are its powerful features and tools. Some of its tools are very intuitive and easy to use. Others, not so much. One of the most powerful tools is tool presets. Tool presets are optimization layers that you can attach to brand new layers or to ones already made in Photoshop. If you apply a preset that has a color swatch, it will make all the colors of the swatch inherit that color on the new layers making it very easy to quickly change your color. Of course, if you are a Photoshop expert you can change the swatch to any color you want, but this is not that kind of online tutorial. When you are ready, you can simply hit delete on the swatch layer and voila, a color change is made. The same goes for the fellow layer that has the selection tool attached. You can choose any selection tool style you want and choose any preset you want. Instead of wasting hours searching through the hundreds of presets to find the colors and styles you want, you can simply hit the color wheel and the preset will be the same as the colors selected. And it is not as though you have to have a large collection of presets to choose from. You can have as many as you want. It is how you use them. Once you know the preset you want and you can change the swatch and selection tool style as necessary, save that preset and then you will be ready to use any other preset that traditionally has a 100% use. 933d7f57e6
